Lessons from a country emerging from economic crisis

The result of a financial crisis left Greece roughly $330 billion in debt. But financial advisors there believe that as their country begins to emerge from its disastrous decade, there will be more opportunities than ever before, especially in areas such as pension planning and long-term health care insurance.

The Association of British Insurers warned on Monday that if Britain leaves the European Union without a deal it could cause long-lasting damage to the U.K. insurance industry.

A no-deal Brexit could result in British insurers having to hold more capital than they need, damaging competitiveness, reducing investment in the economy and seeing people get less from their pension, Huw Evans, Director General of the ABI, said in a statement ahead of the trade

Six ways to "fail better"

"Ever tried. Ever failed. No matter. Try again. Fail again. Fail better." Samuel Beckett's famous words have a nice ring to them. And for a long time, they've permeated the wider circles of entrepreneurship as a kind of mantra.

Failure is necessary. Failure is humbling. Failure is, almost ... trendy?

QBE Insurance has spent the last few years restructuring its business while at the same time weaving the fabric of a global organization with a strong, cohesive culture.

A good corporate culture helps to create good financial results. Consequently, the CEO must spend his or her time painting a picture of what "good" looks like with culture and strategy. Then everybody is pulling in the same direction, affirmed Pat Regan, QBE's group chief executive officer.
